THE very excellent speech made by the Governor at the last meeting of the Legislative Council on the Gambling Ordinance common sense of the community. His Ezcellency fully recognises the evils of gambling, as every one must do, but he also recognises the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of putting a stop to it, and the infew cash in a gambling house is not only an day injustice to the latter, but throws unnecesinveigle dupes into their establishments gramme;treated as social pests every one will agree, Selection and to render them liable to imprisonment without the option of a fine is a very proper measure. There is, however, something to of gambling houses if the keeping of such houses is to be illegal. It seems in the first place to violate the fundamental principle of law that all persons present at the commission of a crime and aiding and abetting are to be treated as particeps oriminis. There is also the practical objection that the keepers of the houses may use the argument that players are not liable to to frequent their establishments. Appended are the scores :-During his fifteen years' residence in the colony the hon, gentleman has carried out many great and important works, has beautified the town, and in numerous ways has contributed to the convenience, comfort, and health of the inhabitants. When Mr. PRICE leaves he will naturally be the recipient of valedictory addresses and the subject of valedictory notices in the papers; these we will not attempt to anticipate at the present moment, but it would be ungracious to allow the first official notice of the approaching retirement of one to whom the colony owes so much to pass without an expression of regret. The step Mr. Parcuis now taking has been in contemplation for some time, but has been delayed until the completion of his great City of New York scross the Atlantic and will provide the town with an abundant sup.

The future of North Borneo is bound up with its timber and tobacco. It is practically a virgin forest without any population to speak of ts timbers are very valuable, and only require to be known to be appreciated. Some of them; believe, are destined to take the place of teak to a very large extent, as not only do they equal this wood but are 30 per cent. cheaper. Now that our mill is completed the various markets will soon be able to test them, and there can be no doubt about the result:

Now First Published. CHAPTER XXVII. MR. QUEST HAS HIS INNINGS. All that afternoon and far into the evening Mr. Quest was employed in drafting, and with his own hand orgrossing on parchment certain deeds, to the proper execution of which he seemed to find constant reference necessary to a tin box of papers labelled "Honham Castle Estates." By eleven that night everything was finished, and having carefully collected and docketed his papers, he put the tin box away and went home to bed. Next morning, about ten o'clock, Edward Consey was sitting at broakfast in no happy frame of mind. He had gone up to the castle to dinner on the previous ovening, but it cannot be said that he had enjoyed himself. Ida was there, looking very handsome in her evening dress, but she was cold as a stone and unapproachable as a statue. She scarcely spoke to him, indeed, ercept in answer to some direct remark, reserving all her conversation for her father, who seemed to have conglit the contagion of restraint, and was, for him, unusually silent and depressed. But once or twice he found her looking at him, and then there was upon her face a mingled expression of contempt and irrepressible aversion, which chilled him to the marrow. These qualities towards him were indeed so much more plainly developed than they had been before, that at last a conviction which he had at first rejected as incredible, forced itself into his mind. That conviction was, that Belle must have disbelieved his denial of the engagement, faint, but there was but one thing to be done, and that was to face it out. Once when the Squire's back was turned he ventured to attempt this he felt was trying. So trying did he find the whole entertainment indeed that about halfpast nine he rose, and came away saying that he had some bank papers which must be attended to that night. Now most men would in all human probability have been dismayed by this state of affairs into relinquishing an attempt at matrimony which it was evident could only be carried through in the face of the quiet but none the less vigorous dislike and conjumpt of the other contracting party. But this was not so with Edward Cossey. Ida's coldness exercised upon his tenacious and obstinate mind much the same effect that may be supposed to be produced upon the benighted seeker for the North Pole by a frozen ocean of icebergs. Like the explorer he was convinced that if once he could get over those cold and frowning heights he would find a smiling and sunny land beyond and perchance many other delights, and like the explorer again, he was, metaphorically, ready to die in the effort. For to tell the truth he loved her more every day, till now his passion dominatod his physical being and his mental judgment, so that whatever loss was entailed, whatever obstacles arose, he was determined to endure and overcome them if by so doing he might gain his end in question when Mr. Quest, looking very cool to his room, much as Colonel Quaritch had been then you can go," and she did so and went. shown in two mornings before.

"How do you do, Quest?" he said, in a from high to low kind of tone, which he was in the habit of adopting towards his official subordinates. "Sit down. What is it?" "It is some business, Mr. Cossey," the lawyer answered in his usual quiet tones. Honham Castle mortgages again, Lauppose," growled he, "I only hope you don't want any more money on that account at present, that's all: because I can't raise another cent while the Go. vernor lives, for they don't entail cash and bank shares, you know, and though my credit's pretty good I am not far from the bottom of it." " Well," said Mr. Quest, with a faint smile, "it has to do with the Honham Castle mertgages but as I have a good deal to say, perhaps we had better wait till the things are cleared away."

" All right. Just ring the boll, will you, and take a ciwarette r" Mr. Quest smiled again and rang the bell, but did not take the cigarette. When the breakfast things had been removed he took a chair, and placing it on the further side of the table in such a position that the light, which was to his back, struck full upon Edward Cossey's fice, commenced to deliberately until and sort his bundle of papers. Presently he came to the one he wanted-a letter. It was not an original letter, but a copy. "Will you kindly read this, Mr. Cossey P." he said quietly, as he pushed the letter towards him across the table. Edward finished lighting his oigarette, and then took the letter up and glanced at it carelessly. At the first line, however, his expression changed to one of absolute horror, his face blanched, the perspiration aprang out upon his forchead, and the eigerette dropped from his fingers to the carpet, where it lay smouldering. And no wonder, for the letter was a copy of one of Belle's most passionate epistles to himself. He had never been able to restrain her from writing these compromising letters. Indeed, this one
